Colorado Backyard Farms Targets Denver and Boulder Urban Dwellers and Local Businesses

New company helps grow fresh, organic produce at your home or business

Denver, Colorado -April 25, 2011- We would like to announce the launch of Colorado Backyard Farms, a company changing the meaning of “local” by creating a unique connection between urbanites, restaurants, and the produce they love.

Colorado Backyard Farms was founded by Zoe Wood, an experienced Denver gardener and landscaper. She has teamed up with contractor/photographer Lila Scott. They specialize in the designing and planting of vegetable, fruit, herb, and flower gardens for restaurants and homes. Colorado Backyard Farms gives individuals and businesses the ability to harvest food and enjoy the beauty of nature in the most direct way possible. Growing and harvesting from these plants is tremendously rewarding and gives people access to their food every step of the way. From the first flower on the tomato plant, to picking its juicy, organic tomatoes for dinner, you know that plant’s history and purity.

Colorado Backyard Farms crafts its decorative and edible gardens in containers, raised beds, and in the ground, depending on the available space. For example, a restaurant can have herbs and vegetables growing on their patio for harvesting. Or, a family can have a garden in their own yard. We also have gardens specifically designed for children, so they can be involved at an early age.

“We hope to encourage people to have a closer relationship with the food they eat.”
